

Call for Papers

LANGUAGE TECHNOLOGY

LangTech at the KFLC is Five Years Old !

We are seeking high quality papers to help celebrate the fifth year of Language Technology as an official division of the Kentucky Foreign Language Conference. In our continuing efforts to create a premier discussion forum at the intersection between technology and literary, cultural, and linguistic teaching and research, we welcome submissions on any aspect of:

Technology for Language, Literature, Culture, and Linguistics

This includes, but is certainly not limited to:

- integrating technology into literature, culture, and linguistics classrooms
- technology as a tool for student projects and research in literature, culture, and linguistics
- faculty research in literature, culture, and linguistics employing technology tools ("digital humanities")

Abstracts are, of course, also welcome in all other areas and aspects of technology and language, such as:

- using tech tools and techniques for language instruction in all skills and on all levels
- guiding language educators toward optimal use of technology in their teaching and research
- employing technology-based research and publication in language scholarship
- managing language technology in an academic setting

The KFLC is an international academic conference that brings together researchers in language, literature, culture, and linguistics in the fields of Arabic, French, German, Hispanic, Italian, Luso-Afro-Brazilian, and Russian Studies, as well as Second Language Acquisition. We would like to see this broad range represented in the Language Technology sessions, to encourage cross-pollination of ideas among the individual languages and disciplines working to integrate technology into their teaching and research programs, and to encourage participants from the various literature, culture, and linguistics sessions to join us in our discussions.

Abstracts should be no more than 250-300 words in length and should be submitted directly online at:

KFLC Abstract Site: <http://www.kflcabstracts.uky.edu/>

In view of the multi-language audience that we hope to attract to all Language Technology sessions, the recommended language of presentation is English.

Deadline for submission of abstracts and panel proposals is 01 November 2009.

All proposed abstracts will be considered for inclusion in the KFLC program. Acceptance of a paper implies a commitment on the part of the participant(s) to register and attend the conference. All presenters must pay the appropriate registration fee by 15 February 2010 to be included in the program. The conference will take place 15-17 April 2010 on the campus of the University of Kentucky in Lexington.

For more information on conference logistics, please visit: <http://web.as.uky.edu/kflc/>. For specific information on the Language Technology sessions, contact the division director at the coordinates listed below.

Join us for beautiful springtime in Kentucky to help us mark this five-year milestone of "LangTech at the KFLC"!
